Message from the President

Happy New St. Patrick's Days to everyone!

I just want to remind everyone to be watching your points for all your dogs. If you see something you feel is not correct please contact Sue Ferrari as she is our Statistician. The Pulling Power Newsletter is your official source of information not the website. So if it is not correct in the NL please get with Sue as soon as possible to get it figured out and correct. Last minute changes to the points can make a big difference whether someone will be making plans to attend the Championships or not.

Speaking of Championships; be sure to watch all the upcoming updates on the Championships in the Newsletter. This year's venue is in Estes Park, Colorado. Estes Park is a very beautiful area and a tourist attraction. Plan early to attend. There is no time like the present to being making plans to attend.

If you will be traveling with your dog/s be sure to have all their immunization records with you. Some states require it! Also please be prepared to pick up after your dogs when you are walking them. It is a very negative behavior to be shown on your part if you don't. If you are at all like my family and many I see traveling to Championships; you wear t-shirts from prior championships when you are traveling. People will realize what you do. Always be a good ambassador for our organization, even when traveling! We have been approached many times by people asking us where we are headed with all our dogs. We of course are anxious to tell them!

Lastly, if you are an organizer for dog pulls in March please be sure to get your results in to Sue as soon as possible. This will help speed the process up and allow the points to get updated in a timely fashion.

Best Regards,

Robbie Reed

Coming together is a beginning. Keeping together is a progress..

Working together is a success...

Q. How good is my dog's sense of smell?

A. A dog's scent organ (inside his nose) is about four times larger than a human's, and a dog's sense of smell is about 50-100 times more powerful than ours. Although all dogs have a powerful sense of smell, some breeds have a greater talent for sniffing out things. A few examples are Basset Hounds, Bloodhounds, and Beagles, which are considered 'scent hounds.' If you live with a scent hound, you know how difficult it is to get his mind focused on anything but odors.

Reduce the risk of your dog biting

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), a federal agency which monitors and controls human diseases, estimates over 4.5 million people are bitten by dogs in the United States every year. One in five of those bitten requires medical attention.

In addition to physical injuries, people, especially children, can be emotionally scarred as well. It is sad, indeed, when a person who has suffered a dog bite can no longer feel comfortable around animals, and may in fact, be terrified of them. Such people lose a wonderful aspect of their lives and a chance to have a meaningful human-animal bond.

Reduce the risk of your dog biting

There is no way to guarantee that your dog will never bite someone. But you can significantly reduce the risk if you:

- Spay or neuter your dog. This may reduce your dog's desire to roam and fight with other dogs. Neutered dogs are 2.5 times less likely to bite than intact dogs.
- Socialize your dog. Introduce your dog to many different types of people and situations so that he or she is not nervous or frightened under normal social circumstances.
- Train your dog. Participating in puppy socialization and dog training classes is an excellent way to help you and your dog learn good obedience skills. Training your dog is a family matter, and every member of your household should be involved and use the same training techniques.
- Teach your dog appropriate behavior. Avoid playing aggressive games with your dog such as wrestling, tug-of-war, or 'sicking' your dog on another person. Do not allow your puppy to bite or chew on your hands. Set appropriate limits for your dog's behavior. Do not wait for an unacceptable behavior to become a bad habit, or believe your dog will 'grow out of it.' If your dog exhibits dangerous behavior toward any person, particularly toward children, seek professional help from your veterinarian, an animal behaviorist, or a qualified dog trainer. Your community animal care and control agency may also offer helpful services. Dangerous behavior toward other animals may eventually lead to dangerous behavior toward people, and is also a reason to seek professional help.
- Be a responsible dog owner. Obtain a license for your dog as required by law, and provide regular veterinary care, including rabies vaccinations. For everyone's safety, do not allow your dog to roam. Make your dog a member of your family. Dogs who spend a great deal of time alone in the backyard or tied out on a chain are more likely to become dangerous. Dogs who are well-socialized and supervised rarely bite.
- Err on the safe side. If you do not know how your dog will react to a new situation, be cautious. If your dog may panic in crowds, leave him at home. If your dog overreacts to visitors or delivery or service personnel, keep him in another room. Work with professionals to help your dog become accustomed to these and other situations. Until you are confident of his behavior, however, avoid stressful settings.

Flea Allergy Dermatitis or Flea Bite Hypersensitivity

Studies have shown that there are over 15 different antigens in the saliva of the flea. Each one of these is capable of causing an allergic response in a sensitive dog or cat. Despite recent advances in flea control, flea bite allergies and flea bite dermatitis still continue to be common problems.

Dogs and cats rarely become desensitized to flea bites once they develop an allergy. Dogs and cats that are not allergic to flea bites rarely develop lesions from the bites, but may bite or scratch at the flea when it bites them. Some studies have shown that up to 40% of dogs in any given area will test positive for flea bite allergies. Other studies show that many dogs with flea allergies also have inhalant allergies (atopy) compounding the problem. There does not appear to be a breed or sex predilection for this allergy.

Preventing flea bites is critical for pets with flea allergies.

Symptoms

Flea bite allergy is characterized by being a seasonal allergy that is worse during peak flea times in the summer and fall. Even in temperate areas or in cases with home infestations, the symptoms of flea bite allergies appear to worsen in the summer and fall. Dogs that have flea allergies will bite at the base of their tail and scratch frequently. Even a few fleas can cause hours and days of intense itching. Many dogs have a characteristic loss or thinning of hair above the base of the tail. In addition, fleas or flea dirt (feces) can be found on the dog the majority of the time. The feces, or flea dirt will dissolve into a red color when moistened; this is because it is primarily digested blood. However, if the dog is bathed or treated regularly, very little evidence of fleas may be found. Severely affected dogs may itch over their entire bodies, have generalized hair loss, and red inflamed skin. Hot spots are often a result of flea bite allergies.

Diagnosis

Diagnosis can be made by visual signs in combination with the presence of fleas or through intradermal skin testing. Intradermal skin testing is a very effective diagnostic tool for this particular allergy, although some false negative results can occur. Since many affected dogs also suffer from other allergies, many times the flea bite antigen is incorporated into a broader intradermal skin testing program.

Flea bite allergy is characterized by being a seasonal allergy that is worse during peak flea times in the summer and fall.

Lymphatic System Anatomy and Function

The lymphatic system performs three important tasks in the mammalian body.

1. It is closely tied to the cardiovascular system and helps maintain the fluid balance between the blood vessels and the tissues.
2. The lymphatic system plays a large role in immunity.
3. This important system also absorbs digested fats from the small intestine.

The components of the lymphatic system are divided into two groups – the primary organs and the secondary organs.

1. Primary Organs: The thymus gland and the bone marrow are primary organs. They regulate the production and differentiation of lymphocytes – the cells that make up the immune system.
2. Secondary Organs: The secondary organs include the lymphatic vessels, lymph nodes, aggregated lymphoid tissue, and spleen. These secondary organs are involved, to some extent, in all three lymphatic functions.

Primary organs

Thymus

The mammalian thymus has two lobes and is situated slightly above the heart and ventral to (below) the trachea. It is relatively large at birth, but after sexual maturity, it begins to degenerate and is quite small in older animals.

The main function of the thymus is to "educate" certain white blood cells of the immune system called "T-lymphocytes," or "T-cells." T-cells identify foreign cells in the body, such as invading bacteria, and mark them for destruction by other immune cells. The T-cells mature in the thymus gland and are "taught" to distinguish between self and non-self cells. If they develop correctly, they are able to recognize the difference between those cells that are supposed to be in the body and those that are foreign. Those T-cells that fail to recognize this difference are destroyed by the thymus so they cannot harm the body. After maturing in the thymus, the T-cells move to the secondary organs, where most of them will remain.

Bone marrow

Bone marrow is the soft material in the cavities of bones. It is a network of connective tissue fibers, fat cells, blood vessels, and blood-producing cells. Bone marrow produces both red and white blood cells, including the lymphocytes. Both T-lymphocytes and B-lymphocytes are produced in the bone marrow. The young T-cells move to the thymus for final development, but the B-cells remain in the bone marrow during maturation. Once the B-cells are fully developed in the bone marrow, they are also released into circulation and most of them take up residence in the secondary lymphatic organs.

The B-cells are white blood cells that are sensitive to antigens and produce antibodies against them. Antigens are any chemicals that produce an immune response in the body, such as toxins, foreign proteins, particulate matter, or bacterial cells. When an antigen is present, the B-cell becomes active and begins to produce antibodies against that antigen. Antibodies are special proteins that bind (attach) to antigens and mark them for destruction. Antibodies are antigen specific, and the immune system is able to remember each antigen it fights. Once a B-cell makes antibodies against a certain antigen, e.g., a bacteria, it keeps a memory of that antigen. If the antigen appears again, the B-cell can produce a large number of antibodies very rapidly. In this way, a second infection with that bacteria is often prevented.

Secondary organs

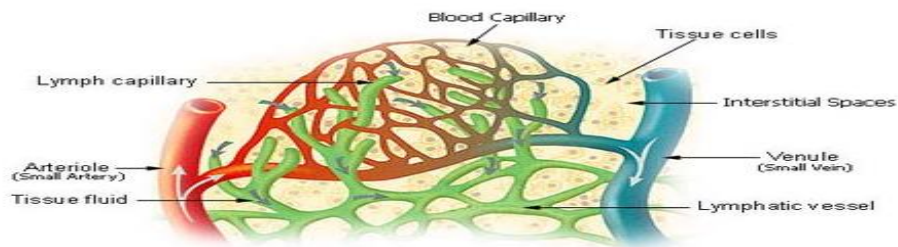

As mentioned, the secondary organs include the lymphatic vessels, lymph nodes, aggregated lymphoid tissue, and spleen. While the primary organs are only involved in the immune function of the lymphatic system, the secondary organs are collectively involved in all three functions:

1. Immunity
2. Fat absorption
3. Fluid regulation

Lymphatic vessels

The lymphatic vessels link together all of the secondary organs and also connect to the cardiovascular system. They provide a route for the one-way flow of lymph from the tissues of the body to the heart. Lymph is the clear, yellowish fluid that is collected from the interstitial spaces (the spaces between the cells of a tissue) into lymphatic capillaries.

Lymphatic capillaries are interwoven with the blood capillaries. Fluid and proteins are forced out of the arterial end of the blood capillary and into the interstitial space. About 90% of the fluid is reabsorbed in the venous end of the blood capillary, but none of the proteins are able to reenter the blood vessels because they cannot fit through the tight junctions of the cells. The lymph capillaries have extremely loose cell junctions, however, and they are able to absorb the remaining 10% of the fluid along with the plasma proteins. Once inside of the lymph vessels, the fluid is then termed "lymph."

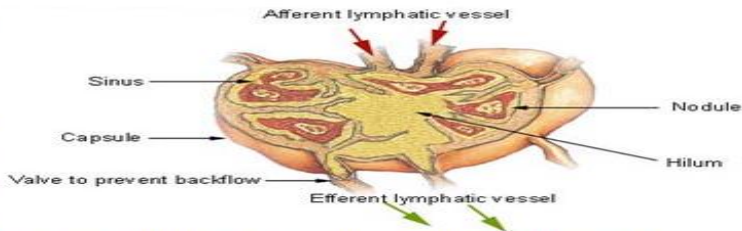

The lymphatic vessels are structured similar to veins, with thin walls and valves to prevent backflow. They are not muscular vessels, and external forces such as limb movement regulate the flow of lymph. Once in the capillaries, the lymph moves into progressively larger vessels, passes through the lymph nodes and/or spleen, reaches the large ducts, and enters the blood circulation near the junctions of the jugular and subclavian veins in the upper chest. Thus, the fluid and proteins are eventually returned to the blood, which helps maintain the proper balance of fluid between the blood vessels and the tissues. All of the lymph from the lower body, left arm, and left thorax are drained through the thoracic duct into the junction of the left jugular and subclavian veins. The fluids from the neck, right arm, and right thorax empty into the right lymphatic duct which joins the venous system at the junction of the right jugular and subclavian veins.

Near the small intestine, where fats are digested and absorbed, the lymphatic vessels have a special function and, therefore, a special name. They are involved in the absorption of digested fat from the small intestine, and are called "lacteals." After a meal the fluid within the lacteals generally has a fat content of 1-2%, and it appears cloudy. This cloudy lymph in the lacteals is called "chyle."

Lymph nodes

Lymph nodes are round or bean-shaped structures that are widely distributed throughout the body. Imbedded in connective tissue or fat, they are concentrated in the cervical, axillary, and inguinal regions – the neck, armpits, and groin, respectively. They are typically less than 1/2 inch in length, depending on the size of the animal. The lymph nodes filter the lymph before returning it to the veins. They are arranged so that all lymph has to pass through at least one node before returning to the veins.

Lymph nodes are enclosed by a capsule of connective tissue and comprised of several compartments called "lymph nodules." The nodules are masses of T-cells, B-cells, and macrophages. Macrophages are specialized cells that ingest and destroy foreign material. The nodules are separated by spaces called "lymph sinuses." The vessels that deliver unfiltered lymph are called "afferent vessels," and there are several per node. The lymph is then filtered for antigens and particulate matter, and an immune response is generated, if necessary. The filtered lymph leaves the node through one or two efferent vessels near an indentation called the "hilum." Blood vessels also enter and exit the node at the hilum.

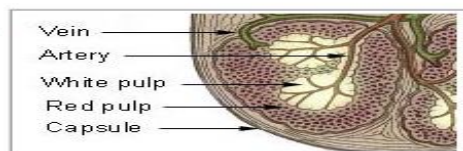

Aggregated lymphoid tissue

Aggregated (clumped) lymphoid tissues are collections of lymphoid tissue that are not encapsulated (in a capsule). They have varying degrees of size and organization. The most highly organized and widely known examples are tonsils and Peyer's patches. The tonsils are found at the back of the oral cavity. Peyer's patches are found in the lining of the small intestine. Tonsils and Peyer's patches have specialized epithelial cells that are capable of transporting antigens, and though they do not filter lymph, they are generally surrounded by capillaries. The main purpose of the aggregated lymphoid tissue is defense from invasion at the mucosal surfaces. These are sites where large numbers of bacteria and other microorganisms are present and can easily enter the body. These specialized lymphatic cells help to prevent infections from developing at these sites.

Spleen

The spleen is a spongy organ located in the upper left portion of the abdominal cavity along the outside curve of the stomach. It is composed of two types of tissue – the red pulp and the white pulp.

1. The red pulp is mostly used to store blood and break down old red blood cells.
2. The white pulp has the lymphatic function of filtering the blood for antigens.

The spleen traps antigens and is another site for initiation of the immune response. In a sense, it is like a large lymph node. A swollen spleen can be a sign of serious infection and is easily palpated.

Conclusion

Though the lymphatic system is often overlooked, it is an important part of the mammalian body. By absorbing fats and trapping antigens, it helps to keep the animal healthy and disease-free. Also, the role of maintaining proper fluid balances is essential. Truly, a healthy lymphatic system is necessary to the survival of the animal.

Aspirin Toxicity in Dogs

Source

Aspirin, Pepto-Bismol, and many other pain and fever medications.

General Information

Aspirin toxicity is much more severe in cats than in dogs. Cats are unable to rapidly metabolize and excrete aspirin. The toxic effects include bone marrow suppression, bleeding, inflammation of the liver, kidney disease, and stomach ulceration.

Children's aspirin contains 81 mg, regular aspirin contains 325 mg, and extra-strength aspirin contains 500 mg. Pepto-Bismol contains 300 mg of salicylate per tablet and 262 mg per 15 ml (1 tbsp.) of liquid. Numerous other products contain aspirin. Be sure to check the label and with your veterinarian before using any human medication on your pet.

Toxic Dose

Dogs: 22 mg per pound per day.

Cats: 11 mg per pound per day, may see symptoms after one dose.

Signs

Signs usually develop within 4-6 hours with an acute overdose. They include depression, lack of appetite, vomiting which may contain blood, abdominal pain, increased respiratory rate, acute kidney failure, weakness, coma, and death.

Chronic lower doses in dogs may lead to stomach ulcers and perforation, toxic liver inflammation, and bone marrow suppression resulting in anemia.

Immediate Action

Induce vomiting and seek veterinary attention.
